Exercise testing before cardiac transplantation: influence of age and perioperative considerations. To evaluate the influence of age and perioperative considerations on myocardial oxygen consumption (VO<sub>2</sub>) during exercise testing before cardiac transplantation, VO<sub>2</sub> was measured in the exercise tolerance test (ETT) immediately before transplantation in 12 patients (group A), from whom the single ventricle was removed and 5 patients (group B), in whom the single ventricle was inserted. In all patients, results of ETT correlated well with the results of a 6-min walk test, which also were performed, and heart-lung machine bypass was not needed in any of the patients. In group A, the mean VO<sub>2</sub> at peak exercise in the ETT (3.5 ± 0.2 L/min) was significantly higher than in group B (2.9 ± 0.1 L/min) (p less than 0.005). In group B, the peak VO<sub>2</sub> (3.4 ± 0.2 L/min), 6-min walk test (36 ± 3 m), and maximal treadmill exercise (236 ± 26 W) results were not significantly different from those in group A. In group A, the age did not correlate with VO<sub>2</sub> at peak exercise in the ETT (r = 0.097). In group B, however, the peak VO<sub>2</sub> was significantly related to age (r = 0.72, p less than 0.05). The favorable outcome of the ETT suggests that clinical usefulness of this simple, safe, and well-tolerated test may improve in heart transplant recipients, especially in those
