This past spring, Wil Myers was an MVP finalist and got 2,000 hits. For a short time he was a major-league regular, then got traded to San Diego for a starting pitcher. He's now in the Nationals organization, and has a great story. That story is really no different than the story of every single player who has a story. What sets Myers' story apart? Well, the fact that he took advantage of an opportunity and went to the University of Texas-Arlington, a school with no baseball program. He got his degree in Sports Media and broadcasting, took it seriously, and is now playing professional baseball. While other players use the "I went to college just because I thought it would be a good idea" rationale, Myers actually went to a school in order to prepare for the day when he went pro. He didn't have to "make his money," but he knew that he needed to work toward getting his degree.
